7. DESCRIPTION

CONDITION

(Check One)

The town of Port Royal is laid out on a grid plan and consists of approximately a dozen blocks with eight principal streets. It is bounded on the north by the Rappahannock River, on the west by U. S. Route 301, and on the south and east by open fields. Some unattractive commercial development is located on Route 301; however, the former principal commercial street, King Street, is now almost entirely residential. Street extends the entire length of the town and ends on the north at the Rappahannock River where the wharves for the port formerly were located. Still remaining on King Street is the eighteenth-century Fox's Tavern, the now vacant mid-nineteenth century Masonic Hall (the Masonic Lodge was first chartered in Port Royal in 1755, making it the second oldest lodge in Virginia), and the eighteenth-century frame mansion of the Brockenbrough family, the interior woodwork of which is now displayed in the William Rockhill Nelson Gallery of Art, Kansas City, Missouri. On Water Street, which parallels the river, stand the enlarged Hipkins-Carr House which contains interesting folk murals in its library, the now deserted and decaying Gray House with its outstanding late-eighteenth century interior woodwork, and the Federal frame mansion of the Lightfoot family. Also located on Water Street is St. Peter's Episcopal Church (circa 1836), an extraordinary little Greek temple-form building with all Gothic detail. Behind the church is the rectory, parts of which date from the colonial period.

In all, there are some thirty-five structures of architectural or historic interest remaining in the town, and nearly all of these date from either the eighteenth or early-nineteenth centuries. Unfortunately the town is now in a decline, and several of the most important structures are either vacant or in very poor repair. Few late-nineteenth or twentieth century structures have been built in Port Royal, and those which do exist are of such simple design as not to detract from the historic character of the town.

STATEMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE

The town of Port Royal was officially established by an act of the Virginia Council in October, 1744. Richard Taliaferro was authorized to survey the town site, and a group of seven men, including William Beverley and Lunsford Lomax, were named trustees to convey lots to purchasers. Largely settled by Scots, the town was originally called Port Roy as it was located near Roy's tobacco warehouse, an establishment owned by a Thomas Roy. A tobacco warehouse had been located on the site since the late-seventeenth century. The town had an excellent harbor, and during the eighteenth century enjoyed a prosperous tobacco trade directly with England. In 1745, the Port Royal merchants formed a guild to promote commerce, thus in fact creating one of the earliest chambers of commerce in America.

In the late-eighteenth century Port Royal had been important enough to be considered as a potential site for the United States capital. However, the town's prosperity was eclipsed in the nineteenth century when the railroads superceded the rivers as the principal channels of Tidewater commerce. As a result, Port Royal saw little of the commercial growth and expansion experienced by most port cities during the nineteenth century. Yet it was not allowed to decay seriously until recently, being transformed instead into a small residential community. Thus the town today possesses a notable collection of eighteenth and early-nineteenth century structures with few modern intrusions. Furthermore, Port Royal is extremely significant because it is one of the few colonial Tidewater towns to be contained entirely within its original boundaries and to retain a semblance of its early atmosphere and appearance without the benefit of restoration or special protection.

Among the prominent residents of Port Royal have been the Reverend Jonathan Boucher, a noted eighteenth-century author; Professor George Fitzhugh, early prophet of an industrialized South; Captain Sally Tompkins, the only lady Confederate officer of the War; and, more recently, the late Thomas T. Waterman, prominent Virginia architectural historian.
